Mr. Diminico, Where Are You?

Kenyon Pollison says in the May Backtalk section that the February Kappan article I wrote with Anthony Deiulio ("Career Education in the Elementary School") refers to a nonexistent Ellensburg, Washington, career education program. We took our information from an article by Gerald Diminico in the November, 1969, American Vocational Journal. Diminico said, "The Ellensburg public schools are testing an instructional system designed to present occupational information to children in grades 4 through 6." He described the system. At the time, he was on the faculty of Central Washington State College in Ellensburg and was himself doing the testing he described, in the campus school. Diminico has since left Central Washington State and we have been unable to get further information on his experiment. Gerald Diminico, where are you? – James M. Young, Jr., Mahanna Road, Bemus Point, N.Y.

Ginzberg Doesn't Understand?

The article by Ginzberg (February Kappan) objecting to the performance of guidance personnel at the interface of guidance and education belies his theme of "understanding." . . . I do not disagree with Ginzberg's perceptions of the achievements of many who are on the job, [but he] does not define the performance expectancies for school counselors at elementary and secondary levels. [He does not understand] the counseling process, either individual or group. . . . I recommend that Ginzberg, after all these 20 years, familiarize himself with counseling processes and role expectations. . . . We seem to be working at odds with each other but toward similar goals. – Allen E. Segrist, assistant professor of education, Counseling and Personnel Services Section, Purdue University, West Lafayette, Ind.

Nash/Agne Pro

The Robert J. Nash/Russell M. Agne article, "Career Education: Earning a Living or Living a Life?" in the February Kappan is a welcome and healthy departure from the existing literature on career education. Peter P. Muirhead's article in the same issue, "Career Education: The First Steps Show Promise," points up the Nash/Agne criticism.

Muirhead's implicit assumptions – that 1) task-oriented skills should receive priority over person-oriented talents, 2) productive careers lead to a rewarding life and self-fulfillment, and 3) unhappy job situations of mature adults are due to a lack of "definite" career goals – only highlight the Nash/Agne point that career educators tend to assume that corporate needs are synonymous with human needs. There is indeed more to life than earning a living. . . . – Donald G. Webb, assistant professor, Division of Human Behavior, Western Colorado University, Grand Junction.

Nash/Agne Con

Nash and Agne have confused philosophies of education and theories of learning. The Marland quote on increased economic productivity (p. 375, February Kappan) has nothing to do with how students learn; it is simply a philosophy of education or a statement of a personal viewpoint.

I applaud Nash and Agne for their concern for the use of learning theory in the development of sound career education programs. They say, "Not once, however, have we encountered an explicit discussion of the learning theory peculiar to career education, let alone an in-depth analysis of its possible limitations." But Mr. Nash and Mr. Agne, there is no career education theory of learning. The learning theories that apply to career education are the same that apply to other aspects of the teaching/learning process.

Not all career education programs are as manpower-oriented as the authors would have us believe. Career education programs (such as the OCCUPAC Project) which emphasize self-development, coping behaviors, life-styles, attitudes and appreciations, etc., have been developed. Nash and Agne chose to quote from a 1-column article on the OCCUPAC Project. There is a 283-page technical report which would have informed them of the learning theory underlying the project. . . . Marla Peterson, director, Career Education Project, Eastern Illinois University, Charleston. □
